Under uncertainty strategic environment, the only one way to strengthen Japanese security, is intensifying the US-Japan relationship. Among Japanese security stakeholders, such recognition is becoming consensus. It would be included that US-Japan would increase strategic goals which they should share, they would raise complementarity of the ally's role each other. Those policies would remind us the importance of keeping US leadership in multi-lateral system. There would be no system such as multi-lateral system in order to maintain free and open international order.

When US would abandon her self-manageable leadership without keeping multi-lateral rules, other nations' incentive to keep rules or norms would drop. As a result, the cost which US would make other nations keep norms or rules might increase. At the same time, like those emerging countries, not only Russia but also China and India, would get power, US military, economic and technological superiority would relatively decline, which could make influence of US psychological superiority. Other nation would discourage their motivation to agree and support the system led by US such as NPT (treaty on the Non-proliferation of Nuclear Weapons). Nuclear governance which was being based on the US superiority would disappear, there would be "Anarchy", expect nightmare how I should express. Liberal democracies should work hard at any cost in order to avoid such situations.
